Dissertation: Interconnected Rivalries

Abstract: My dissertation examines why some interstate rivalries last longer than others and why leaders pay higher domestic costs for interactions with some rival states. I focus on how multiple rivalries and interconnectedness among them influences rivalry duration. Using network centrality measures for interstate rivalries from 1900-2010, I find that rivalries with one central actor and one minor actor (e.g., Iraq-Kuwait) have a higher probability for rivalry termination than rivalries with two central actors (e.g., China-Japan) or two minor actors (e.g., Bolivia-Chile). I also examine triangular rivalry relationships and find that rivalries with common allies or common enemies are more likely to terminate than rivalries with mixed threats, with the effects being strongest in minor power rivalries. Finally, a survey experiment and time series analyses of Japanese prime minister approval (1998-2014) reveal that leaders face higher costs for cooperating with salient rival states. My theory and analyses show the importance of moving beyond the dyadic rivalry framework and incorporating network ties in conflict studies.

This paper examines a rivalry's strategic environment by focusing on triangular relationships. If two rivals are tied to a third party, this can be their common enemy, common friend, or mixed. Analyses of rivalry duration show that minor power rivalries are more likely to be influenced by their common allies (shorter duration) and mixed third parties (longer duration). In contrast, major-minor rivalries are affected by common enemies (shorter duration).

This project focuses on two mechanisms to examine the relationship between climate change and interstate conflict: precipitation anomalies and spatial variability. We use precipitation information from the PRIO-GRID dataset to focus on geographical variations of water and climate conditions.

Do conflictual or cooperative policies toward rival countries matter in domestic politics? If so, are the effects the same across rivals? When a country has multiple rivals, the effects of conflictual/cooperative policies can vary depending on the characteristics of rival relationships. This article focuses on how the public responds to its leader's conflictual or cooperative policies toward rival countries with ongoing territorial disputes. I test my hypotheses using a 2 x 2 x 2 survey experiment in Japan (stronger/weaker x conflictual/cooperative x success/failure) and time series analyses.

[1] Lee, Bomi K., Cody J. Schmidt, and Sara McLaughlin Mitchell, "Paths to Peace in Issue Rivalries"

This paper moves beyond the dyadic rivalry context by considering how issue rivalry networks and extra-rivalry reputations influence peaceful and militarized conflict management in diplomatic issue conflicts. We capture interdependence by assessing the degree to which states are embedded in multiple rivalries using network analysis. We find that rivalry networks constrain militarization by target states in issue claims but have no effect on challengers.
